

Patrick Buckridge is Associate Professor of literary studies in the School of Humanities, Griffith University. He has published widely on Australian literature, and his current research interests are in literary history and biography, literary education, and the history of publishing. He is currently working on a book about the publishing house Harraps.

Stephanie Green has pursued a career best described as picaresque. With creative and scholarly interests in literature, writing, art and journalism, she has studied and worked at several Australian universities, completing a doctorate in nineteenth-century fiction at UWA in 1997. Stephanie has published short fiction and critical essays, including in previous AVSA journals. She has over 20 years experience teaching writing and literature and has also worked in art galleries and literary publishing. Stephanie is currently Lecturer: Public Writing with Griffith University.

Alexis Harley lectures in the English Program at La Trobe University. She has edited an anthology of nineteenth-century William Blake reception, published on Victorian autobiography, and is working on synaesthesia and the Decadence, empathy, and the cinema of artificial intelligence.

Sage Leslie-McCarthy teaches at the Australian National University. She has published on late nineteenth-century popular fiction and twentieth-century science fiction.

Nicole McManus is a graduate student in the Department of English at the University of Colorado at Boulder. Her research interests include the nineteenth-century novel, women's fiction, and the intersections of Victorian gynaecology and feminist theory. The present essay is the winner of the 2007 AVSA Prize.