Two Poems in the Voice of Siddhattha Gotama as He Wanders the Forest

ONE SIGHT

Yasodhara, if you came to me now, I’d say I saw death in the lattice of sunshades, death in a sky of soft cottons, even in the healing gauze of mist upon the water and the rushes.

I’d say there’s death too in weather fine as your shawl, in curtains hung by soft hands and death in the half-wound turban of my own smile. Yasodhara, there’s no refuge in the retinue of leaves attending me; and none in the swallows stitching wide.

None in the retreat of deer to the shadows and none in the owl’s voice low and clear as breath blown across an earthenware sky.

None in the arbors and cool stones. I remember your belly round with our child. O, Yasodhara - each night I dream all of us are lying bloated in the lotus pool.

THE KITE

Today I watched a boy fly his kite.
It didn’t crackle in the wind - but gave out a barely perceptible hum.

At a certain height, I’d swear I heard it sing. He could make it climb in any wind; could crank those angles up, make it veer with the precision of an insect targetting a sting; then he’d let it roil in rapturous finesse, a tiny bird in mid-air courtship. When lightning cracked across the cliff - (like quick pale flicks of yak-hair fly-whisks) - he stayed steady. For so long he kept his arms up, as if he knew he’d hoist that kite enough.

I asked if it was made of special silk, if he’d used some particular string - and what he’d heard while holding it.

He looked at me from a distance, then asked about my alms bowl, my robes, and about that for which a monk lives. It was then I saw I could tell him nothing in the cohort wind - that didn’t sound as if illusory.
